

I understand that you are currently considering allowing passengers aboard commercial airlines to use cell phones while in flight. Please reconsider this. Rude cell phone users have ruined previously nice quiet restaurants, movie theaters, museums and other public places with their loud and annoying private conversations and phone rings. Airplane travel is uncomfortable enough as it is right now with the small cramped quarters and seats right on top of each other. Imagine 4 or 5 folks sitting around you all on their cell phones trying to out talk each other and throw in a couple of the phones that you also have to hear the other party on and air travel will move from simply being uncomfortable and cramped to miserable. At least in a public space you have the ability to move, onboard an airline no such opportunity exists.

Sincerely,

Sharon Heierman
